presents

Behavioral Science in Health and Health Care

An ACCORDS Seminar Series

“Leveraging Automaticity for Healthy Behavior Change”

Participants will be able to:

1. Describe key findings in behavioral science relevant to health behavior
2. Explain how to apply behavioral science findings to create and test interventions for health behavior change

Gretchen Chapman, PhD

Professor of Psychology,
Social & Decision Sciences, Carnegie Mellon University

Dr. Chapman is the recipient of an APA early career award and a NJ Psychological Association Distinguished Research Award, a former senior editor at Psychological Science, and a past president of the Society for Judgment & Decision Making. Her research combines the fields of judgment and decision making and health psychology to illuminate psychological processes and design of theoretically-motivated, policy-relevant interventions to facilitate healthy behavior such as vaccination.
